The innate immune system employs numerous cell-surface and intracellular pathogen recognition receptors that allow it to detect microbial components and initiate an inflammatory response. Among these receptors is Toll-like receptor-4 (TLR4) that recognizes LPS, a major component of Gram-negative bacterial cell walls. In the absence of TLR4 signaling, such as in mice lacking TLR4, Salmonella typhimurium remains relatively harmless; a subpopulation of these mice survive. Here, we show that this tolerant state is maintained through the activation of separate TLR receptors that recognize S. typhimurium components. In contrast to TLR4, which requires ligation by both two-component sensor kinases and adaptor proteins, signaling through the TLR2 and TLR9 receptors depends on the MyD88 adaptor alone. While TLR2-MyD88 activation is essential for antibacterial activity, TLR9-MyD88 signaling is dispensable. Interestingly, TLR2 and TLR9 activation also suppress activation of NF-kappaB and IL-8 production in response to S. typhimurium stimulation. Finally, we show that mice lacking TLR2, TLR4, or both survive infection with S. typhimurium, whereas mice lacking TLR9 survive. These findings establish a link between multiple TLR pathways and innate immunity against S. typhimurium, and in some cases, some of the rival candidates as well. The standing of candidates for a particular position is first assessed and then the candidates are ranked. At the end of the election process, the elected candidate is then announced. Impact of UN reforms on elections The reforms are expected to increase the effectiveness of UN electoral processes and will positively impact on the electoral process in Timor-Leste.
